Talk About It

Most of us know people whose personalities rub us the wrong way. Maybe your cubicle at work is right next to the office's Most Talkative Woman—but that quality might be what makes her great at her job. Kids are learning that everyone, including peers they might not like very much, has different strengths and abilities that make the person unique. Maybe the very thing that annoys your child about a classmate is a quality that will help that classmate be successful in another area of life. Talk about the differences among all the members of your child's class. Thinking of those annoying habits in a more positive way will help your child be more accepting.
